Whether it's a serious health issue, an unexpected death, or an accident, you may need help from an experienced medical professional at any time. When a disaster strikes, the first thing you may think of is your health, but in many cases, a disaster can be traumatic. In fact, some people may never fully recover from a disaster. So how do you know if a disaster will have an impact on your health, and what can you do to help yourself? It's important to be aware of the signs of stress and illness and to learn how to cope with stress and stress-related conditions. According to the U.S. Center for Disease Control, about one-third of Americans will suffer from at least one mental health condition each year. If you or someone you know is feeling suicidal, or if you are experiencing emotional, physical, or sexual abuse, help is available. If you are worried about your own or a family member's safety, or if you are having trouble coping with a traumatic event, you may need to seek professional help. Here are some tips for how to handle and overcome stress in the face of a disaster. Understand your signs of stress To understand your own stress response to a disaster, take a few minutes to think about your typical daily life. How are you doing with your family, job, and health? Do you ever feel overwhelmed? Do you ever feel like you are not able to cope with what is happening around you? Do you find it difficult to do routine tasks? Do you experience stress and depression? If you answer yes to any of these questions, it could mean that you are experiencing stress. This may be the first sign that you are feeling overwhelmed. Get some rest If you are feeling overwhelmed, it's
