To evaluate the influence of implant location on the long-term survival rate of implant-supported complete fixed prostheses. Prospective multicenter study. Instituto de Implantología, Monterrey, México. Submerged implant-supported fixed prostheses were fabricated for 109 patients. Two groups were divided according to the implant location: 94 patients with two implants placed at the implant abutment and seven with two implants placed at the implant cervical margin. The survival rate of complete prostheses was calculated using cumulative Kaplan-Meier survival function and Cox proportional hazard model. The cumulative survival rate of implant-supported complete prostheses was 91.7% at 5 years.

The implant abutment position did not influence the prosthesis survival rate ($P = .71$). A higher probability of prosthesis failure was found for the implant cervical margin ($P = .02$) when compared with the implant abutment position. The failure risk for the implant cervical margin was 15.28 times higher than the implant abutment. The results suggest that the marginal bone level at the implant cervical margin is a risk factor for prosthesis failure. The survival rates for implants placed in the implant cervical margin were lower than for implants placed at the implant abutment, although this difference was not statistically significant.

Is Social Networking Getting Too Big?

Many fear that social media platforms will be the Trojan horses of tomorrow. That they will capture and hold an even larger percentage of our time, will generate greater “websurfing” activity, and will make our lives even more time-consuming, and will even reduce our capacity to interact with our loved ones. Of course, these fears are largely based on the fact that we have been adopting new technology, and as all the new tools (e.g., websites, apps, etc.) are introduced, we are just beginning to figure out how they affect us. It is much the same way that we were not entirely aware of the impact television would have on our lives, until we began to experience it for ourselves. For example, during the baby boomer generation, our parents and grandparents were well aware of the impact of television and radio on their lives, but we were not (I certainly wasn't). As a result, many of us have been quick to criticize
