Wednesday, January 10, 2016 CANCER MODELING There is no doubt that stem cells have fascinated scientists for many years. For a long time, scientists have been studying how to apply stem cells in disease modeling. Even though it is possible to directly differentiate stem cells into any kind of cell, there are still some challenges involved. A group of scientists from the University of California at San Francisco and the Stanford University, along with researchers from Japan and Canada, were able to grow tumors in mice that closely resemble human breast cancer. The tumors were developed using human breast stem cells that were genetically altered to become cancerous. This study provides a potential insight to research of cancer and the treatment of cancer. The same group of scientists developed a model of ovarian cancer using human stem cells. They found that these stem cells were not only genetically altered, but also became cancerous. However, they are not able to make human tumors using the same technique. There are still some challenges to overcome to be able to transplant human stem cells in humans. Researchers are still studying stem cells in order to understand how they work. We are still searching for the “magic bullet” that can target and kill cancer cells. Even though there are still some challenges to overcome, cancer research will certainly benefit from the use of stem cells and cancer modeling. Wednesday, January 3, 2016

EXPLORING THE EVOLUTIONARY STRATEGIES OF SEXUAL REPRODUCTION For many years, scientists have been trying to understand the evolutionary strategy of sexual reproduction. There are different scenarios that explain the evolutionary strategy of sexual reproduction. One is the “selfish gene” theory, which states that the gene is trying to reproduce itself, rather than the entire organism. The other theory is the “death before sex” theory, which says that a mating is a painful and fatal process that is not worth the risk. MouseTool is a free, cross-platform tool for visually examining VH and VL gene usage, putative pathogenicity, and DQ2/DQ8 allelic preferences in HLA-DQ2/DQ8-positive celiac disease (CD) patients. VH and VL gene usage is depicted in the form of an interactive 2D tree view that highlights recurrent clusters or lineages. The putative pathogenicity of specific amino acids at the amino acid sites of HLA-DQ2.5 and DQ2.5/DQ8-related sequences is depicted by a color code that represents the relative change in the probability of a conserved amino acid in a given site being altered to a different amino acid. Similarity or divergence of amino acid usage between HLA-DQ2.5-positive CD patients and HLA-DQ2/DQ8-negative CD patients is depicted by an interactive 3D plot. Human leukocyte antigen-DQ2/DQ8-positive celiac disease (CD) patients have a higher prevalence of putative pathogenic amino acid changes at amino acid sites that form DQ2.5/DQ8 contact compared with HLA-DQ2/DQ8-negative CD patients. MouseTool was developed by Drs. Roseli Martins Ferreira, Elisiane Melchior, and Gustavo Ramalho.
